So says S. A. L. Maduro, whose home is on that island in the Dutch West Indies and who is now at the Hotel Astor, en route to France. Mr. Maduro is a member of a banking and importing firm.

"Divi divi and oranges are the sole natural products of our island," he said. "The former fruit is not good to eat, but is used solely for dyes, and the oranges are grown for their peel, which is necessary for the famous liqueir.

"The island is principally noted for its splendid port, which has the best natural harbor in the world and is outside of the West Indian hurricane could continue the West Indian hurricane zone. It is a principal port of call for steamships, which ffli their coal bunkers there, and is favorably situated on the route of steamers bound for South America and the Panama Canal. Curacao is the safest and cheapest port in the Carlibean Sea, and is 1,769 miles from New York."
